

The Ride That Gave Me Wings (and Extra Work!)

I still remember my first solo ride on my Aactiva. For some people, riding a scooter alone may not seem like a big deal, but for me, it was a small step towards becoming more confident and independent.

Before starting the ride, I was excited, but honestly, I was nervous too. I kept wondering, “Will I reach my destination on time? Will I be able to handle everything on my own?” I had driven the Aactiva before, but riding alone to a destination felt completely different. After checking everything one last time, I took a deep breath and started my journey.

In the beginning, I was a little conscious about every turn and every road. But gradually, I started enjoying it. The nervousness slowly turned into excitement. There was something special about knowing that I was the one controlling the ride, deciding the route and getting myself wherever I wanted to go.

When I finally reached my destination, I felt a strange kind of happiness. I had actually done it! It may have been just a short ride, but it made me feel capable and independent. That day, I realised that sometimes confidence comes only when we dare to do something that scares us a little.

However, I did not know that learning to ride would come with a hidden side effect.

Today, I sometimes look back and think, “Why did I even learn to ride an Aactiva?” Because the moment my family discovered that I could ride, I became their unofficial delivery partner! Going to the market, bringing something from somewhere, or doing a quick household task—somehow, my Aactiva is always the solution.

Still, whenever I remember my first solo ride, I smile. It gave me more than just the ability to drive. It gave me confidence, freedom and a memory I will always cherish.

So yes, learning to ride gave me wings... and apparently, a lot of household responsibilities too!
